RUMINATIONS ON TERRORISM: EXPIATION AND EXPOSITION

Christopher L. Blakesley*

To paraphrase Richard Falk: Terrorism is political or ideological violence without restraint of law or morality. This article will consider terrorism and reactions to terrorism through a prism of history, philosophy, literature, and law. It is an attempt to show how terrorism is committed by state actors, as well as non-state-actors. I argue that intentional or reckless slaughter of innocents or torturing “enemies” constitutes terrorism and that it ultimately erodes a state’s or a group’s morality and well-being. Most nations and groups define terrorism in a way that “allows” them to commit atrocity, but condemns “others” who commit the same acts. This ultimately promotes terrorism. Some definitions obscure the line between terrorism as a crime and terrorism as a tactic or strategy of armed conflict. It is important that the law not do this, as I argue that terrorism is criminal conduct. In addition, many, perhaps most, definitions of terrorism, even in criminal statutes and treaties, do not comport with basic principles of criminal law, such as principles of legality, due process, and other human rights and constitutional norms. I will also compare terrorism to other core international concepts, such as war crimes and crimes against humanity. Thus, the article will consider terrorism as a crime, noting the conceptual relationship between terrorism and basic domestic and international substantive criminal law. I will present a definition of terrorism as a crime, including its constituent elements. This allows me to study terrorism in the context of basic principles of culpability and innocence. The definition applies to conduct whether performed by state or government actors, by those who attack innocents to get at state government, or who use it against innocent members of factions whom they don't see as adhering to the actor's vision of "good order." Much of the article, however, is aimed at providing context by analyzing historical evidences of terrorism, including torture and other atrocities, designed to promote the power of those committing it. Thus, I will present an historical and comparative excursus, considering terrorism or analogous conduct and its punishment from antiquity, through the Middle Ages, to the present day, to show why such conduct ought to be punished.

I. INTRODUCTION

Violence shall synchronize your movements like a tune,
 And Terror like a frost shall halt the flood of thinking.
 Barrack and bivouac shall be your friendly refuge,
 And racial pride shall tower like a public column
 And confiscate for safety every private sorrow.⁷
 Leave Truth to the police and us; we know the Good;
 We build the Perfect City time shall never alter;
 Our Law shall guard you always like a cirque of mountains. . . .¹

A. Overview

This article shows how the term terrorism and the law that proscribes its forms are appropriated to exclude one's own acts of terrorism. Terrorism and its analogues, war crimes and crimes against humanity, have been committed since antiquity.² Systems and theories attempting to check

2. Exodus 21:24; Yoram Dinstein, International Law As a Primitive Legal System, 19 N.Y.U.J. Int'l. L. & Pol. 1, 11 (1986). See Code of Hammurabi (1728–1686 B.C.); Laws of Eshnunna (2000 B.C.); Code of Ur-Nammu (2100 B.C.).

such atrocities have also occurred since antiquity.³ More recently, developments since Nuremberg have eviscerated the historical excuses and justifications for war crimes and crimes against humanity.⁴ Hope survives, but reality remains gloomy. For example, Curtis LeMay, the Air Force General who oversaw the slaughter of an estimated 900,000 people in firebombings of Japanese cities,⁵ admitted that if the United States lost the war, he would have been tried as a war criminal, but claimed that the firebombings were “the right thing to do.”⁶ As states are expected to enforce war crime laws against their own, one would like to hope that war crimes and like offenses would cease to be something only noticed when enemies

3. Rules prohibiting what we now call “crimes against humanity” or crimes against some “higher law” have existed from antiquity. See, e.g., Deuteronomy 20:13–17 (King James); Sun Tzu, The Art of War 76 (Samuel B. Griffith, trans., 1963); Code of Manu bk.7, art. 92 (“Let him not strike . . . one who is naked, nor one who is disarmed, nor one who looks on without taking part in the fight.”); 1 The Law of War: A Documentary History 3, 59–62 (Leon Friedman, ed., 1972) [hereinafter Documentary History] (discussing jus in bello, noting that “[a]ncient Greeks and Romans also followed customary laws of war”). See also Christopher L. Blakesley, Terrorism and Anti-Terrorism: A Normative and Practical Assessment, chs. 7–11 (2006).

4. Articles 7 and 8 of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal (Nuremberg Charter), 59 Stat. 1544, 1546 (1945), eliminated act of state and superior orders as defenses respectively. The International Military Tribunal concluded that “individuals have international duties which transcend the national obligations of obedience imposed by the individual State . . . He who violates the laws of war cannot obtain immunity while acting in pursuance of the authority of the State, if the State in authorizing action moves outside its competence under international law.” International Military Tribunal, Judgment, 6 F.R.D. 69, 110 (1946). Also, “[t]he fact that the defendant acted pursuant to order of his Government or of a superior shall not free him from responsibility. . . .” Id.

commit them.⁷ Crimes against humanity appear to have some acceptance and enforceability, although their enforcement tradition remains even weaker than for war crimes.⁸ The crime of terrorism has not been as successful. The word “terrorism” has yet to develop a description of universally condemned behavior, and remains a mere epithet to apply to enemies.⁹

B. War Crimes

A war crime is conduct that violates international humanitarian law applicable during armed conflict.¹⁰ Although the Nuremberg and Tokyo charters limited the scope of war crimes to international armed conflict,¹¹

7. See infra sections I.B.; IV.A.-C. Although countries occasionally prosecute their own for war crimes and like crimes, the record is not great. See, e.g., Telford Taylor, Nuremberg and Vietnam: An American Tragedy (1970); Blakesley, supra note 3, chs. 8, 10, 11; Jeremy Waldron, Torture and Positive Law: Jurisprudence For the White House, 105 Colum. L. Rev. 1681, 1740–41, & nn.253–54 (2005) (comparing domestic abuse in U.S. prisons to Abu Ghraib); Mark A. Drumbl, Atrocity, Punishment, and International Law, ch. 4 (2007) (challenging basic assumptions of international criminal justice and expressing the need to transcend them for a broad range of responses); Jean R. Sternlight, Is Alternative Dispute Resolution Consistent with the Rule of Law? Lessons from Abroad, 56 DePaul L. Rev. 569 (2007). Still, some prosecution occurs, at least against those at lower ranks. See, e.g., U.S. v. Calley, 48 C.M.R. 19 (CMA 1973); Multiple Proceedings Against U.S. Service Members for Deaths of Iraqi Civilians, in Contemporary Practice of the United States Relating to International Law, 100 *Am. 11. Nuremberg Charter, article 6, provided authority to try and punish persons for crimes including: “(b) WAR CRIMES: namely, violations of the laws or customs of war [including but not limited to], murder, ill-treatment or deportation to slave labor or for any other purpose of civilian population of or in occupied territory, murder or ill-treatment of prisoners of war or persons on the seas, killing of hostages, plunder of public or private property, wanton destruction of cities, towns or villages, or devastation not justified by military necessity.”

Geneva Protocol II¹² and customary international law extend these rules to armed conflict not of an international character.¹³ The Rome Statute for the International Criminal Court provides an expansive listing of war crimes, in article 8(2),¹⁴ which, for purposes of the statute's jurisdictional threshold, must be part of a plan or policy or part of a large scale commission of such crimes.¹⁵ The ICTY Appeals Chamber in Prosecutor v. Tadic categorized war crimes as serious violations that (i) infringe a rule of humanitarian law that is (ii) customary in nature, or meets the conditions of treaty law, (iii) and that protects important values; where the breach involves grave consequences for the victim, (iv) customary or conventional law must establish the individual perpetrator's criminal responsibility.¹⁶

C. Crimes Against Humanity

A crime against humanity is conduct that violates "humaneness," offending important principles of law to the degree that it concerns the international community; has "repercussions beyond international frontiers"; or "exceeds in magnitude or savagery any limits tolerated by modern civilization."¹⁷ The term "crime against humanity" has been used in a nontechnical sense, at least since the declaration of May 28, 1915, wherein the governments of France, Great Britain, and Russia denounced the massacres (genocide) of the Armenian population by the Turkish government.¹⁸ International

13. Customary international law on this issue has evolved through international instruments and conventions, such as the ICTR, art. 4; the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, July 17, 1998, 2187 U.N.T.S. 90, art. 2(c)-(f), plus customary rules of international law and general principles that these instruments either reflect or have established.

agreements have formalized and refined this principle since that time. Article 6(c) of the Nuremberg Charter defined a crime against humanity as murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation and other inhumane acts committed against any civilian populations, before or during the war; or persecution on political, racial, or religious grounds in execution of or in connection with any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, whether or not in violation of the domestic law of the country where perpetrated.¹⁹

The Rome Statute for the International Criminal Court article 7 adds additional conduct including torture, sexual violence, imprisonment or other severe deprivation of physical liberty in violation of fundamental rules of international law, group persecution, enforced disappearances of persons, apartheid, and “other inhumane acts of a similar character intentionally causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or to mental or physical health.”²⁰ This conduct could also be terrorism.

D. Terrorism

Osama Bin Laden appears to have been the highest profile leader to boast about and exploit “terrorism” to describe actions carried out by his own side.²¹ Ironically, others define the word terrorism to exclude their own conduct and favorite justifications and excuses.²² Modern definitions of terrorism seek to put one’s own state terrorism²³ or terrorism by our own or

To confront terrorism, which is essentially violence against innocents perpetrated for ideological purposes, we need to define it honestly, unmasking the pious fraud that riddles our justifications and excuses for it.

Terrorism in general terms is political or ideological violence without restraint of law or morality.²⁵ To prosecute and punish terrorist conduct, we must define terrorism clearly enough that it is not vague so as to violate the principles of legality, due process, and similar constitutional and human rights principles.²⁶ The following working definition of terrorism provides an opening point: *the use of violence against innocent individuals for the purpose of obtaining thereby some military, political, or philosophical end from a third-party government or group.*²⁷ An innocent is anyone who is

24. For example, China envisions terrorism as a type of “splittism,” to include even peaceful independence movements on behalf of Taiwan and Tibet. See, e.g., Edieth Y. not an actual or imminent aggressor.²⁸ My definition rejects application of self-defense, because innocents include non-combatants in war and non-attackers in a non-war setting.²⁹ Self-defense does not apply to using deadly violence against anyone who is not threatening one's life or limb, in either context. Unfortunately, many international jurists have not learned or have forgotten essential and basic criminal law.

Terrorism has always been an instrument of statecraft, domination, oppression, revolution, and rebellion. A very small sampling includes the following. The Salvadoran Army in the 1980s reconstituted its program of mass execution of civilians to intimidate "its enemies."³⁰ The outrages against *desparacidos*³¹ and the depredations of the Khmer Rouge are well known.³² The United States has a long, sad history of supporting authoritarian governments in Latin America,³³ for example, those in Terrorism has been defined in ways that endanger democracy, erode civil liberties, and actually promote terrorism, in that the definition provides immunity for one’s own terroristic conduct. The United States and other countries tend to define conduct as terrorism, in ways and at times it finds convenient.³⁹ The United States, for example, has considered philanthropic organizations providing coloring books to Afghan children to be engaged in terrorist activities.⁴⁰

Terrorist actions sometimes carry a pseudo-religious purpose that we shall call expiation, where the innocent suffer to atone for a wrong and to make the terrorist or his allies whole.⁴¹ Another nearly universal purpose of terrorist actions is what we shall call exposition, where the innocent suffer in order to help publicize or emphasize a set of messages to one's enemies and/or allies.⁴² In practice, expiation and exposition are closely intertwined. I will discuss the expiatory and expository effects separately in order to explore how they correlate.

II. HISTORICAL EXCURSUS

A. Expiatory Violence

This section will study examples of attempts to expiate through punishment, considering the relationship between the authority or power to punish and the people's need for expiation. Prosecution and punishment developed to punish crimes committed internally. Leaders have been able to exploit this by promoting the idea that the good of the group and the individual were dependent on punishment of enemies and wrongdoers.⁴³ The people needed the wrongdoer to be punished and the wrongdoer needed punishment.⁴⁴ If the wrongdoer was a foreigner and had taken refuge abroad, it was necessary to capture him or a proxy to accomplish this expiation, often requiring war.⁴⁵ War, terrorism, and punishment thus seem to have been cut of the same cloth. Although redemption and

42. The word "terrorism" itself emphasizes the effect that the terrorist "message" has on one's enemies, but the effect on one's allies and even on third parties is often much more significant. The terrorist message often "preaches to the choir"; it is often more important to persuade one's reluctant allies that the enemy is afraid than it is to actually terrorize the enemy. See infra section III, "Expository Violence."

cleansing the soul are good things, the tendency of group leaders to exploit this need or instinct is troublesome.

Punishment has been the means to rid society of crime's perceived taint.⁴⁶ In virtually all ancient cultures, metaphysics and law were merged.⁴⁷ Society was required to purge itself of the taint of crime, to avoid the wrath of the God or gods. Punishment of the wrongdoer, combined with religious ceremony, cleansed the community, avoiding divine wrath. The Code of Manu provided that rest and happiness for the wrongdoer and society are obtained only by soul-purging punishment of the perpetrator.⁴⁸ Metaphysical harm could only be avoided through spilling the blood of the perpetrator or his proxy. If the perpetrator who put the group at metaphysical risk escaped, the group had to seek his return or find a proxy to punish.⁴⁹

The lex talionis, or law of exact retaliation, in the Jewish Torah or biblical Pentateuch⁵⁰ "requires" an eye for an eye⁵¹ to benefit the punished as much as the punishers. The social cell or group would require vengeance against those who were found to have committed a crime against it or its leader. The punishment for patricide in ancient Rome (specifically including killing your mother or father, but also symbolizing regicide) was to be beaten by rods stained with your blood, put into a bag with a viper, a dog, a cock, and an ape, and thrown into the sea.⁵²

Blood atonement applied in ancient Israel for some offenses.⁵³ When murder, theft, or assault were committed, it was necessary that both society and the perpetrator purge the “taint.” When Jericho fell to Israel, “they utterly destroyed all that was in the city, both man and woman, young and old, and ox, and sheep, and ass, with the edge of the sword.”⁵⁴ Another example is found in chapters nineteen and twenty of Judges. A concubine of the “Levite sojourning on Mount Ephraim” had been raped and murdered. The Levite believed that certain citizens of Gibeah, Benjamites, had committed the crime. The Levite sent a “diplomatic note” along with a portion of the concubine’s cadaver to each of the other tribes of Israel to symbolize the need for solidarity to obtain vengeance for the crime. When the Benjamites failed to deliver the alleged perpetrators, they were virtually annihilated; every man, woman, child, animal, and plant were extirpated from Gibeah, and only six hundred or so men were left in the tribe of Benjamin.⁵⁵

The Cheyenne required purging through punishment, including a “breaking of the arrows” ceremony for tainting the food or water supply.⁵⁶ Intra-tribal murder “required the keeper of the arrows to cleanse the tribe of the specter of death” through punishment.⁵⁷

Many societies favored the cleansing qualities of fire for their method of capital punishment. Nero burned people at the stake to propitiate Vulcan, the god of fire.⁵⁸ Although these forms of ancient punishment are repugnant to us today, the mystical need to seek retribution, to “cleanse,” “heal,” and make society whole again after it has been tainted continues.⁵⁹

Throughout history, ancient or more recent memory of crime committed prompts a desire for retaliation. Oppression or perceived oppression is impetus for retaliation and punishment when the chance arises. Any member of the opposing group (family, clan, tribe, people, religion, class, nation-state) becomes the subject of retaliation. The retaliator is not viewed by his or her own group as a criminal or a terrorist because he or she is an instrument of the group's need to avenge and expiate itself. Once this occurs, the other group feels that a crime has been committed against it and is thus justified in a counter-reprisal. The blood feud—the vendetta—rages. No doubt, violence is justified in certain circumstances, but not when intentionally or recklessly applied to non-combatants or innocent civilians. Rape, murder, torture, and maiming innocents are criminal in wartime as in peacetime.⁶⁰ They are often terrorism.

B. Other Historical Reigns of Terror

Society, through the ages, has faced dialectical reigns of terror. Some of them tell poignant and valuable stories to provide insight into current reigns of terror and “counterterror.”

1. Medieval Abuse: Terror in the French Middle Ages, Through the Seventeenth Century, and the French Revolution: The Rule of Law As Power

Terror and power interrelated in a horrifically emblematic and theatric way, as French medieval theoreticians and technicians of punishment used the symbol of the bourreau (the executioner) to represent the king's power.⁶¹ Contemplate the playing card king. His inverted reflection represented the person condemned to be “expiated” for attempted regicide, of which parricide was the functional equivalent, or, at least symbolic enough to receive the same punishment. This is important because society was based on a political and economic structure where the patriarch represented the king in his realm, and was coopted and protected as a mini-king.

60. E.g., Hugo Grotius, De Jure Belli ac Pacis, bk. III, 723, 733 (1625) (Francis W. Kelsey et al. trans., 1925) (“the death of innocent persons must be prevented ‘so far as is possible’”); Larry May, Crimes Against Humanity: A Normative Account 99 (2005).

61. Foucault, supra note 43, at 11–13, 28–30, analyzing Ernest H. Kantorowitz, The King's Two Bodies (1959). Before punishment could be inflicted, it was necessary to “establish guilt.” This was done by formulary torture, which was intended to find what was called “the objective truth.” The only means to obtain truth was out of the accused's mouth, so the inquisitor applied torture to obtain this “truth.” See Bernard Gui, Manuel de l'inquisiteur (Guillaume Mollat, ed. & trans., 1926). See also, e.g., Jean Kellaway, The History of Torture and Execution 58–59 (2000) (“water torture”); H.C. Lea, The Inquisition of the Middle Ages (1961).

Throughout Roman history and much of the medieval appropriation of a simplified version of Roman law for feudalistic systems, the patriarch or paterfamilias was coopted to make him a mechanism to foster the king or emperor's power. The legal, economic, and political systems functioned through the paterfamiliae, in a system that can be described as a pyramid with the emperor or king at the top. Each paterfamilias had his own little pyramid. Each had pretty close to absolute power within their pyramid. Hence, parricide or attempted parricide was the functional equivalent of regicide or attempted regicide, in that it threatened the essential authority of the chief patriarch or paterfamilias, the king.

The king's opposite simultaneously represented the powerlessness of the condemned and the people. The omnipotent king held control of life and death over his subjects. One who would challenge that power had to be shown to have absolutely no power or hope. It would not do simply to execute him: the executioner was to take that régicide up to the very edge of death by torture, then bring her back again, then up to death and back again—up and back, up and back, a thousand times. The bourreau was “the man of a thousand deaths.”⁶² Finally, the individual was “allowed” to die when it suited the king.⁶³ The traitor and the people were shown not even to have the power to die—demonstrating the king's power over their very soul. The ritual demonstrated a policy of terror to impress the people with the power of the king.⁶⁴

It is natural and right that people revolt against such power. The French Révolutionnaires did so applying tactics of terror learned from their former masters in the Ancien Régime. They turned on their former masters; the Reign of Terror followed. The king card simply rotated; régicide became “king,” the former king and his supposed supporters became ritual victims. Violence is certainly justified in some circumstances—in rebellion and revolution to escape oppression.⁶⁵ Violence and terror against innocents, however, are neither noble nor justified. When revolution takes that turn, it descends to a self-destructive reign of terror. Murder has always been murder, rape, rape, and terror, terror. So it was, under the Ancien Régime and the following Reign of Terror, no matter how it was rhetorically “glorified” or “justified.”

When violence explodes with its ferocious and relentless intensity against those who “represent” or “symbolize” the enemy, it often consumes those who wield it. Évariste Gamelin (in Anatole France’s novel Les Dieux Ont Soif),⁶⁶ a sensitive artist interested in rectifying injustice, becomes a paranoid monster as he is consumed with the need and desire to guillotine all who might have been connected in the slightest way with the Ancien Régime and, finally, no real nexus was needed at all. “Righting wrongs,” in Gamelin’s case, ultimately destroyed not only the original oppressors (who had wielded violence first, to oppress and to maintain power), but also innocent proxies and, finally, those who used it second, to avenge the former evil. Violence and rage, thus, consume the good that prompts them. Gamelin, who was finally decapitated by his beloved guillotine, makes the point when his hatred and self-delusion persuade him that “evil-doers” were everywhere and that they were seeking expiation through the guillotine, “as a right.”

From all sides the victims surrender themselves. Nobles, virgins, soldiers, prostitutes flock to the Tribunal to extract their delayed condemnations from the judges, claiming death as a right, which they are eager to savor.⁶⁷

Perhaps we all have not reached that level of depravity or mental disease, but can we really say that we are much different today, when we condone, acquiesce to, or are willfully blind to massive slaughter of innocents, torture and murder in the name of fighting “terrorism?”⁶⁸ Our executive sovereign has tried to keep this sort of atrocity secret but he kidnaps people and tortures

66. Anatole France, Les Dieux Ont Soif 198 (1978). Madame DeFarge, of Dickens’s Tale of Two Cities, is also an interesting literary symbol of this. She had good reason to wish to avenge herself and the French people. The Revolution was justified. DeFarge knit and registered all who would be executed to avenge and “free” her people. Once the wave of violence and concomitant power took hold, they consumed her as she embodied them. Charles Dickens, A Tale of Two Cities (1859). See generally Ruth Scurr, Fatal Purity: Robespierre and the French Revolution (2006).

them.⁶⁹ When found out, the sovereign pretends that he commits those atrocities “only against terrorists” or “evil-doers.” That is not a legal excuse or justification, anyway, and the policy is applicable by “law” to anyone whom our executive sovereign signals as “terrorists.” Other nations and groups do similarly, so ultimately everyone is subject to attack by groups who kidnap, torture, and murder “their enemies,” including innocents, for the “greater good.”

In war, revolution, or any situation, when violence is intentionally or wantonly applied to innocents or non-combatants, it is murder, a war crime, a crime against humanity, or terrorism, even if rhetorically glorified. The French revolution overcame the Ancien Régime, but adopted its slaughter of innocents, ultimately giving rise to the directorat, a regime that was at least as bad as the Ancien Régime. A balance and relative end to the violence eventually developed as a result of the rule of law. However, the rules of humanity have not changed; violence against innocents remains immoral and criminal and excuses or justifications are meaningless.

2. The Very Early “Modern Era”

Suarez, Vittoria, Jean Bodin, Hugo Grotius, and Emerich de Vattel all called for the rule that each nation has an obligation to “prosecute or extradite.”⁷⁰ They argued that punishment was necessary for those who commit serious offenses, requiring that there be no sanctuary for the criminal.⁷¹ Later, ascendant “positivism” in the eighteenth, nineteenth, and first half of the twentieth centuries posited the rule that international law was binding only on states and could not impose obligations or punishment directly on individuals.⁷²

In 1768, the great criminalist Cesare Beccaria, like natural law jurists Grotius, Jean Bodin, and Vattel, argued that “the conviction of finding nowhere a span of earth where real crimes were pardoned might be the most efficacious way of preventing their occurrence.”⁷³ Beccaria’s chef d’oeuvre, Dei Delitti e Delle Pene, has profoundly influenced Western criminal justice. His theory focuses on philosophical utilitarianism and the idea of “just desserts” (retributivism). He believed that punishment for crime should follow directly and surely upon its commission and that the punishment must fit the offense. Yet he insisted on moderation, fairness, and humanitarian values based on law, regardless of the perpetrator. He believed that extradition could play a significant role in diminishing crime.

In a manner reminiscent of current antiterrorism rhetoric, Beccaria wanted to eliminate impunity and sanctuaries for criminals, but considered it crucial that extradition be fair and based on law.⁷⁴ No black hole secret prisons or extraordinary renditions for Beccaria. Careful to develop concepts of extradition that promoted humanitarian criminal justice, Beccaria qualified his pro-extradition stance by stating that he would not decide an extradition’s ultimate usefulness until the law began to conform to the “needs of humanity.”⁷⁵ Beccaria’s writings influenced extradition law, the rule of speciality,⁷⁶ and the idea of dual criminality,⁷⁷ but his overarching vision has yet to come to fruition. The blood feud, the mal du siècle, which really appears to be eternal, accelerates in the new millennium.

Violence for expiation may begin as an effort to extend or consolidate power or to oppress opposition. Or, it can begin as an effort to throw off oppression, or as an effort to extend or consolidate power or to oppress opposition. Or, it can begin as the perpetrators see it, to make the world safe for their ideology, their “way of life,” or their religion. Other times, the wronged group or state looks to right wrongs or to obtain retribution. Sometimes, it is the nihilist looking to destroy the status quo with terror. Even the nihilist seems to have an almost metaphysical vision of the need to destroy, using violence, war, terrorism, crimes against humanity, and torture to reap vengeance, or, hypocritically, to gain power, becoming a bureaucratic functionary. Once the perpetrators gain power, they use terror to maintain it, and the cycle continues. Today we have developed some mechanisms for legal prosecution. We occasionally use them.

III. EXPOSITORY VIOLENCE

Sometimes violence in its various forms is motivated by a zealot’s vision—a radical vision of “truth” or “good order” that must be enunciated, established, and maintained by any means necessary, including violence against innocents. Leaders often exploit the zealot’s tendencies to promote a favored political order. Almost any ideology, philosophy, or religion may be used to promote murderous fanaticism.⁷⁸ Powerful groups and states often use these crimes to maintain that power and wealth.⁷⁹ For example, the Dirty Wars in Argentina and in Chile used terror-based offenses to punish dissent and threats to their power and vision of the “good order.”⁸⁰ The records of Nazi, Stalinist, Maoist, and Khmer Rouge regimes are infamous enough that they need no citation. Members of some “radical” movements continue to slit throats or behead captured civilians, journalists, or soldiers, as pathetic advertisements for their pretended cause, while others, including states, continue, in turn, to torture, kidnap people, and kill indiscriminately. Human history provides far too many tragic episodes of innocents sacrificed to “send a message.” The “message” may be sent to quash insurgency or rebellion, to embolden allies, to warn citizens or adherents of the consequences for cooperating with the enemy, or to terrorize populations, intimidating them into surrender.

Consider the carpet bombing of London, Dresden, and Tokyo. Consider the effects of dropping a nuclear bomb on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, where the leaflets dropped over Japan prove that the explicit aim was to slaughter innocents to create terror.⁸¹ The warning to the people of Nagasaki was similar to the one used in Hiroshima.

WARNING NAGASAKI

Attention Japanese People. Evacuate your cities.

Because your military leaders have rejected thirteen part surrender declaration, two momentous events have occurred in the last few days.

The Soviet Union, because of this rejection on the part of the military has notified your Ambassador Sato that it has declared war on your nation. Thus, all powerful countries of the world are now at war with you.

Also, because of your leader's refusal to accept the surrender declaration that would enable Japan to honorably end this useless war, we have employed our atomic bomb.

A single one of our developed atomic bombs is actually the equivalent in explosive power to what 2000 of our giant B29s could have carried on a single mission. Radio Tokyo has told you that with the first use of this weapon of total destruction, Hiroshima was virtually destroyed.

Before we use this bomb again and again to destroy every resource of the military by which they are prolonging this useless war, petition the emperor now to end the war. Our president has outlined for you the thirteen consequences of an honorable surrender. We urge that accept these consequences and begin the work of building a new, better, and peace-loving Japan.

EVACUATE YOUR CITIES

81. PBS, American Experience, Truman, http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/amex/truman/sources/ps_leaflets.html. These leaflets were dropped on August 6, 1945.

The use of certain weapons designed to cause massive death or unnecessary suffering constitutes a war crime, a crime against humanity, or terrorism, depending on the context.⁸² The Hiroshima and Nagasaki bombings were calculated to terrorize⁸³ and induce panic among Japan's population and leadership so that they would surrender.⁸⁴ The Allies chose Nagasaki because it was "undefended" in the legal sense of the Hague Conventions and other international law,⁸⁵ to signal to the Japanese that we will vaporize

82. Moral philosophers agree that the Hiroshima and Nagasaki bombings were terrorist and immoral. See, e.g., Michael Walzer, Just and Unjust Wars: A Moral Argument with Historical Illustrations ch. 13 (3d ed., 2000); Michael Walzer, Terrorism: A Critique of Excuses, in Problems of International Justice 237; (Steven Luper-Foy, ed., 1988); John Rawls, Fifty Years after Hiroshima, in Collected Papers 565 (Samuel Freeman, ed., 1999); Igor Primoratz, The Morality of Terrorism, 14 J. Applied Phil. 221, 231 (1997). While accepting the faulty idea that a "supreme emergency" will justify or excuse killing of innocents, Walzer, Rawls, and Primoratz condemn the bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, and the blanket bombing of Dresden and others, because they find that the excuse did not obtain. See C.A.J. Coady, Terrorism, Morality, and Supreme Emergency, 114 Ethics 772, 777 (2004) (finding these bombings to be immoral). Coady rejects the "supreme emergency" excuse as to intentional or reckless killing of innocents. So do I. On the other hand, protecting innocents does not appear to have a clear policy in philosophy and practice. Augustine, Contra Faustum, XXII, at 75 (Philip Schaff, ed., 1956); Reynolds, supra note 28, at 4–5 n.12, 85. Augustine's "punitive model for warfare" made "no distinctions between combatants and civilians . . . because there is no moral difference between the two. St. Augustine's moral emphasis on the guilt of the enemy population could justify violence against it. The premise of guilt as justification for war was also justification to protect those who were not guilty." Id. at 5 n.12.

83. We must distinguish terror in the general sense, as a war tactic, from terrorism, since the latter involves innocent targets. Destroying the enemy's will to fight is often a purpose of a terrorist act, but does not necessarily make a violent act an act of terrorism. Harlan K. Ullman coined the phrase "shock and awe" in a 1996 report calling for a strategy involving massive coordinated precision air attacks that destroy the enemy's will to fight while also destroying the enemy's physical ability to fight. Such a strategy may or may not constitute terrorism, depending on whether innocents are targeted.

84. See Richard A. Falk, The Shimoda Case: A Legal Appraisal of the Atomic Attacks upon Hiroshima and Nagasaki, 59 Am. J. Int'l. L. 759, 761 (1965) (describing victims with "rags of hanging skin, wandering about . . . [and lamenting] among the dead bodies").

The Japanese argued in the even your innocents, unless you capitulate. Many still consider this conduct to be “acceptable,” arguing that warnings of the terrible consequences of not surrendering were given to Japan—that the Japanese leadership knew that the United States had the bomb and that it would be used if their government did not submit to all Allied demands by a certain date. Terrorists often emphasize that their acts come as a consequence of governments ignoring their warnings.⁸⁶ Warnings, then atrocity, provide a common theme in total war,⁸⁷ but warnings and shared fault cannot excuse targeting innocent civilians.

IV. THE REIGN OF “COUNTERTERROR”

We delude ourselves, pretending that we do not commit terrorism, when we are manipulated to believe that we may use terrorism or terrorist tactics, because we have justice, goodness, or God on our side, or when we claim that because others commit terrorism, we may do the same. These delusions are self-destructive. To define or characterize terrorism on the basis of the end sought is misguided and self-defeating. Terrorism must be defined in a manner that does not excuse or exclude one’s own conduct.⁸⁸ Dashiell Hammett warned, “Play with murder [we can insert torture or terrorism] enough and it gets you one of two ways. It makes you sick, or you get to like it.”⁸⁹ Camus wrote, “[E]ven if murder is in the nature of Shimoda case that Hiroshima and Nagasaki were undefended before the atomic bombs were dropped, so article 25 of Hague IV applied. See Hilaire McCoubrey, International Humanitarian Law: Modern Developments in the Limitation of Warfare 8–17 (2d ed., 1998) (also article 27 shows “[t]he basic principle of limitation of legitimate bombardment to military objectives . . .”).

86. See, e.g., John Alan Cohan, Symposium, Necessity, Political Violence and Terrorism, 35 Stetson L. Rev. 903, 951 (2006) (Bin Laden explained that Americans should have “urge[d] their leaders to change their Middle East policies,” and that “if the United States had listened to his warnings in the 1990s, the United States might have changed its foreign policy in the Middle East, and the September 11 attacks could have been avoided.”).

man, the law is not intended to reproduce that nature.⁹⁰ Terrorism is criminal. So are its analogues, torture, war crimes, and crimes against humanity, including indiscriminate bombing of civilians. The danger is as grave for the torturer's, war criminal's, or terrorist's well-being as it is for the nation or group that accommodates him.

A. Propagandistic Appropriation⁹¹ of Law and the Term Terrorism

From the legal and moral justifications to “do whatever it takes” to fight for a just cause to the manifestos and self-righteous calls for vengeance, counter-terrorist measures bear an increasing resemblance to terrorism itself. Legislators, judges, scholars, and people on all sides seem willing to justify, excuse, or ignore conduct that is morally repugnant, illegal, and dangerous to their own interests. Terrorism and counterterrorist overreaction strains the core of democracy. Some professed libertarians argue that abuse, even torture, are appropriate or acceptable under extreme circumstances. Sadly, abusers have the power. Governmental overreaction and abuse at home or abroad, using rhetoric of fighting terrorism, providing security, or protecting “the homeland,” erodes security, democracy, and constitutional liberty. People have allowed their leaders to manipulate their fear of terrorism and have acquiesced to the erosion of morals, the constitutional legal system, and any sense of right and wrong. Using terrorism to “fight” terrorism makes us terrorists. We lose our moorings when we descend to the level of simple vengeance or become so fearful and overwrought that we commit or condone atrocity.

B. The United States and Torture

Torture is an example. Michael Ignatieff wrote, “we need to widen out our reflections, think about the moral nihilism of torture and why—this is the most painful question—torture remains a temptation, even a supposed necessity, in a war on terror.”⁹² Ignatieff continued, “[torture] when committed by a state, expresses the state’s ultimate view that human beings are expendable. This view is antithetical to the spirit of any constitutional society whose raison d’être is the control of violence and coercion in the name of human dignity and freedom.”⁹³ The moral nihilism of torture⁹⁴ is revolting, yet to the Bush administration, torture is functionally “legalized” by narrow definition and pretended executive power.⁹⁵ The law is perverted to accommodate our government’s moral nihilism. Those who make the decision to violate our values in the name of “security” or “anti-terrorism” or “democracy” must not be allowed to devalue our law and morals by being given impunity. Law itself is corrupted. We are corrupted.

Professor Dershowitz may be correct that torture will always occur in perceived emergencies. But if we allow Congress or our judiciary to be complicit in torture or terrorism, we enshrine that conduct as “legal.” When we do this, it represents what we are. Justice Jackson’s dissent in the Koramatzu case captured this mechanism with reference to an aphorism by Cardozo: “[a]n enshrined rule” will “expand to the limits of its logic.”⁹⁶ Thus, whether we allow torture is a matter of principle, morality, and legality: it reflects our standards.⁹⁷ All torture and terrorism must be treated as criminal.

Whose terrible future may have just arrived.⁹⁸

Sartre represents many who have justified violence against innocents, arguing that anyone not engaged in fighting the adopted cause were enemies, hence, the equivalent of aggressors or oppressors.⁹⁹ Camus correctly rejected this ethic to the extent that it finds virtue in slaughtering innocents even for a supposed just cause.¹⁰⁰ One can defend innocents of the world without destroying other innocents.

The established clichés or the “ethic” of order based on terror lead ultimately to a moral and legal abyss. Statists who seek to maintain or expand their power, like the power-seeking terrorists, apply ideology based on demonization of others and death. Thus, oppression and exploitation of human beings to accommodate one's material interests, even if disguised in some high-sounding abstraction, are terroristic.¹⁰¹ In the end, self-justification and self-delusion allow so-called enemies to feel justified in their counter-vengeance and sought expiation. Oppression, terrorism, most states of emergency, and in-kind counter-violence are of a kind. They continue the frightening cycle of tyranny, evil, and death¹⁰² that we passively allow through our government or leaders. Our obligation as human beings is to fight passionately to save the lives of all other human beings.¹⁰³

Sartre correctly but incompletely argued that a war of national liberation "once begun . . . gives no quarter."¹⁰⁴ In any conflict, however, intentional or reckless killing of innocents by states or any group is criminal even if deemed justifiable or acceptable for a "just cause." Sartre's attitude is especially troublesome when groups are manipulated into accepting unending conflict. President Bush has adopted that ethic, calling for a "War against Terrorism," which will be continual and indefinite, requiring all our devotion.¹⁰⁵ Is it really far fetched to compare the "Crusade" against Islam during the Middle Ages with the marketing of a "clash of civilizations?" Policy makers and pundits have cynically used 9/11 as a "battle flag" call for vengeance in their version of "Holy War." If both sides believe in an ongoing, unending war for survival against "evil doers," values, human rights, morals, and civil liberties are at risk. It is becoming clear what we will accommodate when we remain in a state of emergency setting. What are we willing to become? Torturers, killers of innocents, terrorists? A fight for survival, even one for gaining or retaining power, may cause people to do unspeakable things, but the law must not—does not—justify, excuse, or accommodate this. It is not morally or legally justifiable to kill innocents, regardless of how effectively it is perceived to be or how much it intimidates others.¹⁰⁶

Terrorism and current responses to it are of one cloth. Simone Weil and Thomas Merton were not far off in expressing this, as they described a great beast, which is the urge to collective power, “the grimmest of all the social realities.”¹⁰⁷ They said, aptly, that this lust for power is masked by the symbols of “nationalism, fundamentalism, capitalism, fascism, [and] racism.”¹⁰⁸ I would add perversions of religion, morality, and values, including sovereignty, self-determination, liberation, revolution, freedom, democracy,¹⁰⁹ and national security. Often, what is represented as morality, religion, values, democracy, freedom, etc., is really “a chimerical state of things in which one would keep for oneself alone the power to make war while all other countries would be unable to do so.”¹¹⁰ By manipulating a people’s sense of community, ethnicity, heritage, nationalism, or religion, and by causing fear that these are at risk, insecurity and xenophobia are fostered. Leaders cause their followers to commit or acquiesce to unspeakable acts. It is important to explode the myths used to foment such violence or terrorism and crimes against humanity will be the “norm.”

Terrorism poses a vicious threat to peace and human dignity, but the ordinary person may be capable of overcoming the manipulation that prompts participation. There may be a common core of values that allows us to recognize these crimes and to condemn them.¹¹¹ We condemn easily when these crimes are committed against us. We need to instill in ourselves the vision and fortitude to recognize and resist when “our leaders,” or our compatriots, want to pursue that sort of conduct against “others.”

Terrorism is condemned—it is criminal—whether committed by states against their own inhabitants or extraterritorially. It is criminal whether perpetrated by occupiers, insurgents, oppressors, or those struggling for independence or freedom from oppression. Individuals commit these offenses whether as direct actors or as functionaries acting in their official governmental capacity or as functionaries of nongovernmental groups. All of these principals are subject to law and may be punished for committing directly or aiding and abetting the criminal conduct analyzed herein. Impunity must be eliminated.

If prosecution is to occur, the elements of the offenses must be clearly established. Thus, this criminal conduct we call terrorism includes: (1) violence committed by any means; (2) causing death, great bodily harm, or serious psychological harm; (3) to innocent individuals; (4) with the intent to cause those consequences or with wanton disregard for those consequences; (5) for the purpose of coercing or intimidating some specific group, or government, or otherwise to gain some perceived political, military, or other philosophical benefit. Torture is analogous, even when the victim is a captured enemy fighter.

Human rights protections for victims and the accused must be clarified and vigorously maintained. To date, this has not been done well in treaties or statutes. Perhaps customary and jus cogens principles, as manifest in the domestic laws of virtually all nations, provide the needed clarity and specificity. The penal codes of all nations and the customary rules of groups everywhere condemn the conduct discussed herein.

The pretentious justifications, excuses, and rationalizations given by apologists for those who commit atrocity ring hollow, and are frighteningly familiar.¹¹² Care must be taken to ensure that international and domestic action to obtain justice and to prosecute perpetrators does not fall into the same trap that ensnared those who committed the crimes. If we allow ourselves to descend to simple vengeance, terrorism, torture and
